Chief Gall was one of the most aggressive leaders of the Sioux nation in their last stand for freedom. He was also a man who lived a life of adventure. Even his childhood was filled with adventure, from the time he was a baby and took a wild ride on a dog travois.

When Custer and his army entered Sioux Territory, Gall joined in the fight, bringing his men against General Reno. Sitting Bull had confidence in his men so long as Gall planned and directed the attack, whether against United States soldiers or the warriors of another tribe. He was a strategist, and able in a twinkling to note and seize upon an advantage. He was really the mainstay of Sitting Bull's effective last stand.
